The general design of the remaining steel is fully welded against a reinforced concrete slab at the floor levels, including "moment" in column sections. The deckboard drive is controlled by the steering wheel, the components of which are interconnected through an internally mounted steering rail 1, which is fixed to the steering column 2. The position of the steering rail is independent of the input to which the drive is. The lower parts of the valve rods are located in a steering housing 3, which is fixed to the upper plate housing of the deckboard drive. The steering angle of the drive is about 30° from the steering position.

To improve the steering of the outboard drive, it is designed with an asymmetrical tilt device 2, which is operated by the steering wheel. The tilt device is based on the action of the steering wheel and consists of an elastic member which operates a pull rod in the pivot point through the medium of a control pin. This rod retains the steering wheel and lifts the out drive to its tilting position. As soon as the drive has reached its fully tilting or fully steering position, the elastic member acts automatically, when being lowered, the drive automatically returns to the position of the steering wheel. The maximum tilting angle is about 30°. The outboard drive remains in the desired tilting position. This makes turning around possible with the out partly tilting for short periods at low cost.
