

TOUCHSCREEN

FINGERTIP CONTROL

A touchscreen allows users to interact with what is shown onscreen, by changing the display according to touch input. It can be used to manipulate images or enter text via an onscreen keyboard.

With a smartphone or tablet, you can order a pizza, find directions, take a photo, browse the Web, and so much more, all using the touch of a finger. On top of the device's display screen but beneath the outer protective glass is a grid of two sets of fine, transparent wires mounted at right angles to each other. These carry pulses of electric current. Holding a finger close to one part of the grid affects the currents flowing through the wires. This enables a controller chip inside the device to work out the finger's location and feed this information to the device's main processor.

DRIVING AND SENSING

Touchscreens are used in many devices alongside an LCD (liquid crystal display) or OLED (organic light-emitting diode) screen (see pp. 246-47) or an electronic paper display (see pp. 220-21). On top of the display, mounted on a thin layer of plastic, sit two sets of transparent wires, called driving lines and sensing lines. Tiny pieces of insulation at each intersection separate them so they do not touch, but they are close enough that the level of current flowing through the driving lines can be detected by the sensing lines and relayed to the controller chip.
