

There Are New Solutions

With a focus group of business leaders, commissioners from 10 FAFAS regions discuss a growing segment of students who need the services of a college preparatory program that doesn't yet exist in their state. State offices across the country are faced with a similar challenge. Many institutions are forced to adapt to this reality and continue to explore new strategies to support their students. The inclusion of FAFAS in the expansion of college access, learning, and financial aid delivery supports a much-needed focus on financial aid flexibility, and provides offices with the tools they need to support and partner with their students in the right education choices. In addition to making sure our students have access to financial aid, we must also make sure that our students are prepared to succeed in their postsecondary education.

"The local offices of FAFAS have their deep knowledge of the financial aid industry and the landscape."

Why is it so hard to increase college-going? According to experts in the field, when colleges and universities work with their institutions to develop financial aid programs, they often fail to take into account students' financial circumstances as factors in the process. With more than 600 offices of FAFAS across the U.S., the organization sees that a strategic financial aid partnership provides a unique opportunity for increasing the student experience and overall resilience of students.

The following are a few of the recent publications from the Office of Financial Aid and Student Support Services:
