HOW IS Chocolate MADE?

Among Indians of South America a ancient drink was a chocolate made by the fine beans of a cacao tree, growing in a certain place in South America. These beans are to be cleaned during the roasting. The dried beans are then parched in a pot. The seeds are cracked and taken out and shelled off (peeled), roasting them all the time. In this process there remains the outermost part of the bean. This bean only contains 1/2 to 1 percent of chocolate per gram.

After this seeds are cleaned of the outer beans are removed and left to ferment for 8 days. Once fermented, the beans are opened and are hung to dry in the sun for a week. Next, there's a sort of a processing point, where they're cleaned, washed, and cracked again to separate the beans. The other non-chocolate parts are taken out. These parts are then ground into a powder called cacao beans even though it contains no chocolate.

The cacao nibs (cacao beans) and cacao beans are combined with sugar, vanilla, and interesting mix. Then the mixture is to then melted through heat, causing chocolate to be formed. Once the chocolate is all melted through, other ingredients can be added such as Chocolate in powder and such.
