The Getty Center ,1991     The Getty Center Harold M. Williams,1997-12-01 These two volumes chronicle the building of the Getty Center from site and architect selection through design and construction     Building the Getty Richard Meier,1997 One of America s most eminent architects tells us what it was like to undertake the architectural commission of the century the building of the Getty Center in Los Angeles Writing with wit and passion and in engrossing detail Richard Meier takes us behind the scenes of the thirteen year long one billion dollar project We follow Meier from 1957 when just out of Cornell he traveled to Europe for a grand tour and to seek work with two of his architectural heroes Le Corbusier and Alvar Aalto and through to his early years in New York with Marcel Breuer After Meier established his own private practice we see him designing public housing and the private houses that expressed his distinctive modernist style of pure geometric line of whiteness and open spaces flooded with light We also see him in time designing such important art centers as the Museum of Decorative Arts in Frankfurt the High Museum of Art in Atlanta and the Museum of Contemporary Art in Barcelona And then in 1984 the Getty Center Meier tells us how he was selected from more than thirty architects after a lengthy and involved series of interviews to design the cultural campus on the spectacular 110 acre site overlooking the Santa Monica Mountains and the Pacific Ocean. The Getty was a new cultural institution and Meier worked with the program directors to design the buildings that would serve them best. In the beginning neither he nor the Getty had any idea of the complications in store for them. Each of the Center's six components including the Getty Museum had its own set of priorities. Meier faced two important contradictory challenges: the creative and the practical. His task was to design a series of buildings that would stand as architectural masterpieces. But at the same time he had to deal with myriad specific demands and limitations imposed not only by his client but also by the local homeowners who were alarmed by the specter of a vast complex arising in their midst. As a result the design process itself was not completed until 1991 when the drawings and large scale model of the Center were finally unveiled to the press. But Meier's task had scarcely begun. The sheer scale and complexity of the project and the number of people involved in every decision continued to mean constant revisions. As construction moved ahead Meier lived on the site yet commuted to his New York office to manage ongoing European projects while in his new office in Los Angeles the population of architects handling the Getty grew to more than a hundred. Although the Center's design had been agreed on much negotiation lay ahead before questions of material color and landscaping were at last settled. Finally in 1996 almost half of the Center was ready to be occupied and Meier could see that the work carried out by the many architects, engineers, technicians, craftsmen and builders for thirteen years was well on its way to being completed. Meier's fascinating book chronicling the creation of one of the cultural monuments of our time is a unique record of the art and process of building in this century and an important contribution to architectural history.
