Abstract

[illegible]

Blackburn's investigations of the birds generally ran the length of his long professional life, and he was particularly interested in the general ecology, distribution, and movements of the group of birds he called the "passerines" or the "small, mainly song birds" (1960). His investigations and reports included a few volumes devoted to the general biology of birds, other ecological studies, and the movement of birds in the air (see several references in the preceding section). His work was published in a number of books, articles, and reports, and these were written in a style accessible to both professional and nonprofessional students.

These results suggest that social skills in general, and interpersonal communication abilities in particular, are related to the likelihood that an individual will successfully be hired into an organization. Moreover, the results suggest that the general cognitive functioning and personality of the potential employee are important in the hiring process. In particular, it was suggested that the hiring manager would make hiring decisions based on perceived social behaviors and history of similar conduct. Additionally, the results show potential hiring errors that occur are more often over-employment than the underemployment and/or underemployment errors.

Following such a discussion, the author's approach to teaching and testing was quite different from the last stage of work described. After identifying several elements and conditions influencing an applied image transformation, some more general knowledge about learning was applied to the findings. For the following learning phase students were presented with scenarios that provided concrete, partly, false and partly correct information. Some students were provided additional information, for example, the learning goals and the importance of learning for the
