CHAPTER 9 Data Design

Chapter Exercises

Questions

1. In the auto shop examples on page 348, what are some problems that might arise in Mario's system? Why won't Danica run into the same problems? Provide specific examples in your answer.

Mario relies on two file-oriented systems, sometimes called file processing systems, to manage his business. The two systems store data in separate files that are not connected or linked, as shown in Figure 9-3. Unfortunately, using two separate systems means that some data is stored in two different places, and the data might or might not be consistent. For example, three data items (Mechanic No., Name, and Pay Rate) are stored in both files. This redundancy is a major disadvantage of file-oriented systems, because it threatens data quality and integrity. In fact, Figure 9-3 includes a typical discrepancy, which involves the pay rate for Jim Jones.

Danica, on the other hand, uses a database management system (DBMS) with two separate tables that are joined, so they act like one large table as shown in Figure 9-4. In Danica's system, the tables are linked by the Mechanic No. field, which connects the tables. Notice that except for the common field, no other data items are duplicated. The DBMS design, also called a relational database or relational model, was introduced in the 1970s and continues to be the dominant approach for organizing, storing, and managing business data. The error in Mario's file could not occur in Danica's relational database, because an employee's pay rate is stored in only one place. (Pages 348-350)

2. What is a DBMS? Briefly describe the components of a DBMS.

A DBMS provides an interface between a database and users who need to access the data. In addition to interfaces for users, database administrators, and related systems, a DBMS also has a data manipulation language, schema, and physical data repository. (Page 350)

3. Describe a primary key, candidate key, secondary key, foreign key, and a combination key. Use your imagination to provide an example of each key that is not in the textbook.

A primary key is the field or combination of fields that uniquely and minimally identifies a single member of an entity. A candidate key is a field or combination of fields that could serve as a primary key; only one of the candidate keys can be designated as the primary key. A secondary key is a field or combination of fields that serves as a basis for some type of retrieval or processing. A foreign key is a field or combination of fields whose value must match a primary key value in some other table or file.

Students should be able to suggest any number of "keys" from their personal experience. This might be a good team task, with a competitive element thrown in. (Pages 356-357)

4. What are entity-relationship diagrams and how are they used? What symbol is used for a relationship? What is an associative entity? Provide an example.

Entity-relationship diagrams (ERDs) are graphical representations of an information system. They are used to show how each entity relates to the other entities in the system, but
