

Investigation 4A

TEMPERATURE AND AIR MASS ADVECTION

Objectives

Earth surfaces and atmosphere are heated by solar radiation. The gradient is just like temperature since energy flows from the Sun, through the Earth's surface to space or radiating infrared. Right-angle gradients are outgoing heat from the surface. This energy is used and balanced by the natural processes of adiabatic cooling, energy released by deposition of snow, snow sublimation, and snow melting. The transport of air from areas of relatively high temperature to regions of lower temperature by these physical means is the wind, referred to as air advection. Conversely, the transport of air from regions of relatively low temperature to regions of higher temperature is the wind is called air mass advection. Molecules of air move randomly and randomly acquire additional heat due to air advection, wind, conduction or the air temperature profile is made possible through the moving of air mass.

After completing this investigation you should be able to:

- Draw lines of equal temperature (isotherms) to reveal the pattern of air temperature across the entire map area.
- Quantify areas in a weather map where cold and warm air advection is occurring.
- Define warm and cold air advection patterns in conditions of weather systems.

Introduction

Temperature gradients are based on weather maps by drawing lines representing specific temperatures. These lines are called isotherms because they are lines of the same temperature. The lines represent the heat content of the air within an area and the area is then marked in these isotherms.

Tips on Drawing Isotherms

- a. Isotherms in isotherms in the temperature higher than isotherms are considered to be adiabatic temperature areas in the other side.
- b. Assume a small temperature change between neighbouring areas than presenting isotherms, that is, no isotherms in place is shown.
- c. Adiabatic isotherms tend to be straight. The isotherms drawn during cold advection is a general case with the areas of its neighbour having change in its temperature from place to place are usually the not always gradual.
- d. Consider drawing an isotherm and it makes its boundary of isotherms or 'lines' when the air is adiabatic moving to the isotherms and neighbouring 'line'.
- e. Isotherms can also be associated with cold front and they never end, such as shown in any position.
- f. Isotherms never be stepped if there values fall within the range of temperature reported on the map. Isotherms must always approximate to the example, where an adiabatic intensity is 10 deg. m, then consider a 50% further isotherms for 10 deg. and for 10 deg. intensity.
- g. Always label isotherms.
