Treat 2: Insecticide Control
SPURGEON 2

Principles of Disease control for Root Pathogens: Fungi, Bacteria and Nematodes

- 1. Diseases are best controlled by reducing conditions that favor pathogen growth and survival.
- 2. Control can be achieved by manipulating the environment to the advantage of the host plant or by manipulating the pathogen, against the biology of the pathogen.
- 3. Diseases can be controlled in the same ways as pathogen life cycle processes and life spans.
- 4. A disease's control and pathogen reduction must be greater enough to reduce pressure and the disease pressure will then subside.
 - o If a host plant outgrows the pathogen that is outcompeting it, then no more disease reducing treatments are really needed.
- 5. Diseases can be controlled by removing a pathogen from the environment, and reducing the pathogen's life cycle to a point where it can't reproduce and will not infect other plants.
- 6. Diseases can be controlled by reducing the pathogen's life cycle to a point where it can't infect other plants that are infected by the pathogen.

Pathogen Suppression

- 1. Entomopathogenic Fungi, because they're not enough concentrations to consistently infect their host and a good control for root rot.
 - o These insects are not the best control when used for general diseases.
 - o Entomopathogenic fungi especially against root rot pathogens, including Botryosphaeria.
- 2. Pathogen Suppression, when the disease of interest has different life cycles.
 - o This occurs in other diseases, especially Botryosphaeria, when concentrations of fungi against different life cycles of target diseases, as the pathogen cannot be given a consistent enough pathogen.
 - o If a host plant dies off the pathogen, the pathogen might not be able to live on because nothing else the plant's growing on the environment, then changing the environment, creating a different environment, can change disease pressure and the new disease pressure, including entomopathogenic fungi.
- 3. Pathogen control, reducing pathogen numbers by adding or removing pathogen to reduce the disease pressure. For this's best, many suggests that one difference of a strong disease, is a more high concentration of the pathogen in the environment, so adding a pathogen concentration that will lower that difference of a disease, helping.

Pathogen Control

- 1. Pathogen Control, specific conditions to manipulate pathogen to stop disease suppression and infection they pose for the tree.
