

Move to Increase Teacher Salaries

September 12, 2014 by Qasim Sharif - Leave a Comment (Edit)

In the South Dakota public school system, superintendents struggle to hire and keep teachers. In February, a survey conducted by the Associated School Boards of South Dakota and the School Administrators of South Dakota indicated that a majority of the districts believe this is due to lack of competitive pay options for educators. One hundred and thirty districts responded, out of the one hundred and fifty four total schools in the state. Each indicated that pay was the major factor in why teachers failed to retain employment in the South Dakota public school system. This belief is not unfounded; in June, over thirty percent of the posted teaching positions in the state remained open and unfilled.

As a result, according to an article recently completed by Argus Leader, representatives from several South Dakota statewide educational organizations worked together to create a bill that would propose an increase to public school teacher salaries. The bill they have devised will create a teacher enhancement fund in an effort to raise teacher salaries across the entire state.

This is done in reaction to the opinion of many educational officials that the base salary for educators needs to be brought to a "respectable level."

Rob Monson, executive director of the School Administrators of South Dakota, leads the endeavor. He will be joined by other educational officials in attending a meeting of the Legislative Planning Committee in Pierre. At this meeting, Monson and his colleagues will present the draft of their bill to the committee. The draft of the bill is merely preliminary; Monson believes the document will suffer many changes and revisions if it is allowed to move through the Legislative. Regardless of possible revisions, Monson believes in the need for the bill and firmly supports the necessity for it to pass through the appropriate channels.
