Mapping resource references to resources

On the Map resource references to resources page we can see that there is a field called Target Resource JNDI Name as shown in the figure below, and it already has the JNDI name jdbc/mydatasource. If you recall from our datasource creation, this was the JNDI name that we gave to our data source which we want to use to connect to the Oracle database. The reason that this wizard page is presented is to give us an option to override the JNDI name of the data source that we wish to use. The idea here is about decoupling the application from the data source. This level of abstraction means that an administrator can choose which data source is to be used as opposed to the application. There might be a requirement to change the database and move the data to a different data source. This can be done via the wizard at deployment time and also post-deployment by changing the application settings in the administrative console.

The web.xml file contained in the web module defines an internal name that the application uses for the data source. In this application example, it uses the name jdbc/hrdatasource, however, we configured our WebSphere data source to be jdbc/mydatasource. This screen is used to map the two together. This is a very powerful concept of J2EE application design and allows for deployment time changes based on administration decisions which do not affect the application code, providing flexibility of deployment.
