NOBEL PRIZE AWARDS

By WATSON DAVIS
Director, Science Service

THE Nobel prize awards to Professor F. Joliot and Mme. Irene Curie-Joliot, in chemistry, and to James Chadwick, in physics, recognize two of the most important achievements in physical science in recent years: Discovery of the neutron, now considered one of the three ultimate particles of all matter in the universe—the achievement of James Chadwick, of the University of Liverpool, and at the time of his discovery in 1932 at Cavendish Laboratory in Cambridge, England. Discovery of artificial radioactivity and manufacture of new radioactive elements—the achievement of the Joliot's early in 1934.

The award to Irene Curie, as she signs her research papers, marked the first case of child of a Nobel prize winner receiving the Nobel prize. For Mme. Joliot is the daughter of the late Pierre and Marie Curie, Nobel laureates jointly with Henri Becquerel in 1903 for their work on radioactivity. The mother of Irene Curie also received the Nobel prize in chemistry in 1911.

The discovery of the neutron by Mr. Chadwick grew out of the modern alchemy of physics whereby transmutation is accomplished—not the turning of lead into gold desired by the alchemists, but more important to science, the turning of many light atoms into other elements in small but significant amounts. Lord Rutherford, head of Cavendish Laboratory, knocked "H" (chemical symbol for hydrogen) out of nitrogen in 1919. There was one light-weight element, beryllium, that resisted similar transmutation, and it was an attack on this metal that produced neutrons.

When bombarded with a stream of helium atomic hearts let loose by that radioactive cousin of radium called polonium, there was produced from beryllium a stream of powerful radiation. The Joliot's in Paris and two Germans, Bothe and Becker, thought that it was the well-known gamma radiation so useful in cancer treatment, but Mr. Chadwick recognized it as a stream of electrically neutral particles which had been suspected from theory and had even been named "neutrons" before discovery. Because of its electrical neutrality, the neutron has the ability to plunge itself into places that can not be reached by other atomic particles. It was immediately seized upon as a very welcome tool for prying open the atom.

Two years later the achievement of artificial radioactivity by the Joliot's was world-acclaimed. The persistence and unchanging nature of natural radioactivity has perplexed scientists. Try as they will, they can not speed, slow or otherwise change an iota the constant natural disintegration of radium or any other radioactive substance.

Man-caused radioactivity was first produced in aluminum. A stream of helium atom hearts was flung at a thin foil of this metal. Out came first neutrons and then a stream of positrons, another atomic particle discovered in 1932 by Dr. Carl D. Anderson, of the California Institute of Technology. What was unusual and important is that the positrons were flung off for many minutes after the bombardment stopped. The atom was disintegrated not like an explosive shell but like an incendiary bomb. Here was radioactivity made to order. There was great activity in laboratories as atomic particles of various kinds were flung by high voltage current at various substances. A large number of substances were transmuted into new radio-elements that lived for minutes, hours or a few days, and then blew themselves up with release of powerful radiations. There was hope aroused that these new radio-elements would be of medical and industrial importance. To-day it is known that plans are under way in one laboratory at the University of California to produce radiosodium in quantity in the hope that eventually it can be used in the treatment of disease through its injection into the blood-streams of the patients.

The two American centers of research where the researches of Mr. Chadwick and the Joliot's have been supplemented most intensively are at the University of California, under Professor R. O. Lawrence, and at the California Institute of Technology, under Dr. C. C. Lauritsen. Both institutions have apparatus for producing the high voltage current necessary for flinging various atomic particles at different sorts of matter. Another atomic particle, the positron or positive electron, was discovered by Dr. Carl D. Anderson at the California Institute of Technology in 1932 shortly after Mr. Chadwick's discovery of the neutron.

THE STRATOSPHERE ASCENT

THE success of the Armistice Day stratosphere flight of the balloon Explorer II, bearing Captain Albert Stevens and Captain Orville Anderson to new altitude records, hung in the balance for an hour and a half during preparations for the take-off. Press reports merely said, "A rip in the balloon fabric was discovered during the inflation and repaired."

But both the men in the balloon and members of the advisory committee on the ground held their breath every instant the balloon was aloft hoping the great 20-foot-long patch would hold. It did, and the Army's non-commissioned balloon officers from Scott Field have won thanks which in war time would merit military citation. Their names are Master Sergeant J. H. Bishop and Staff Sergeant Olaf Jensen. Working with them were J. F. Cooper and J. R. Kelly, of the Goodyear Company, which constructed the balloon bag.

When the two stratosphere balloonists reached their highest altitude, they looked down upon what is normally considered the sky. So much of the air and dust particles of the atmosphere lay beneath them that the white or hazy sky, made that color by the scattering of light, was down and not up. The sky above and outward toward the horizon was deep violet, which indicated that the red
