Tideland David Batchelder:

Tideland David Batchelder, David Campany, 2015 After five years of looking closely through his camera at a small beach David Batchelder no longer sees the shores as we know them His vision now is of a private reality within the tideland In Tideland Batchelder invites you to join him in his visual journey into a tideland like none that has yet been photographed Batchelder uses the camera not to picture more clearly that which we already know but to discover and capture the unsung beauty of our land He shares with us an inexplicable ambiguous imaginative and odd world of magical visions landscapes spaces creatures and curious objects disfigured and eroded by the ocean Although Batchelder uses digital processes his approach to creative camera work has its origin very much in the era of film using a digital camera and Photoshop as one would have used a film camera and a darkroom David Campany's essay introduces Batchelder's tideland world where the viewer's imagination and memory take over and you too leave the beach as you now know it

David Batchelder Christiane Stahl, 2019 David Batchelder's images are labyrinths of wondrous forms surprising colors and shifting layers They give us the impression of flying over landscape formations snowy mountain ranges or meandering rivers or alternately we seem to be in the midst of choppy seascapes where unfamiliar creatures are rising up out of the blue green depths However the photographs depict nothing more than banal segments of a beach in Charleston South Carolina The abstract quality of these natural motifs bring out hidden ideas Suddenly we see faces ghosts animals and plants Batchelder's work is an homage to Alfred Ehrhardt's series Das Watt The Tidelands 1933 1936 In contrast to the German avant garde photographer from the 1930s Batchelder an American born in 1939 is not interested in the laws of structure but the chaotic strange surreal and irrational in short the world of dreams and the imagination
