Schar,2011

decision making styles affect highway rail crossing HRC accidents That is a simplistic approach of portraying human error as the cause of most HRC accidents needs to be augmented with a more complex theory of human decision making process while performing driving tasks before and during a highway rail intersection Video and still photos were taken to identify the intersections appropriate for this study The intersections were among many in the Los Angeles metro area with crossings that demanded certain driver maneuvers with potential accident consequences Based on these selections both field and laboratory experimental sessions were designed to study three sets of variables driver decision styles conditions in the intersection environment that could influence these decisions environmental complexity and the driver maneuvers to cross the intersection The variable of distraction inside the crossing intersection was also studied using recall versus recognition tests The parametric tests analysis of variance showed significant differences in the drivers scores for the decision style variable However other variables showed no significant results The same results were shown using the chi square nonparametric test These results showed that driver decision style is an important factor in the way drivers perceive and behave in highway rail crossings Further research was recommended to study the effect of each intersection design feature on driver behavior
