

It is clear to me that, for many readers, the border between reader and writer is a thin, flexible one—thin and flexible in a way that, for example, the border between butcher and burger eater is generally not. Reading and writing are tightly linked pursuits. A story consumed today is a story created tomorrow. And so on. Witnessing this tight circle of creation and consumption is magical to me—a private highlight of my life as an editor. The circle is also, I think, magical to Tessa, Maggie, and Brenna. So magical that, like any good magicians, they couldn't bear to keep it private. And thus they built a stage on which to showcase their conjuring—and also to refine it. And that's what the Merry Sisters of Fate is, both as an online critique group and as this book you're about to begin. It is the public performance of the private act of story craft. It is writers reading so that writing might happen so that they'll have something to read tomorrow and so on for as long as there are stories to tell and readers to read them.

With that in mind, I hope you will enjoy this curious book of stories, and the stories behind the stories, for the magic they create and the magic that creates them.
