Introduction

In the construction or squaring the circle I going to try of respect a lot the Grecian limitations, but of course, using some basic principles that I think are correct and necessary for this work, accepting as norm a logic deduction: "What it is not forbidden, logically it is allowed".

But much more, this method would be interesting apart of being respectful with ancient norms, for the use a different principle of construction, as it is the use of the "integer" circumference as the first parameter to take in mind. Later on with the circumference as initial parameter we obtain the other ones.

In this work it is used two unique tools as they are:

A ruler without scale, which represents the length of the circumference  $2 \cdot \pi \cdot r$ ,

A compass

Of course, apart paper, pencil, etc. to draw the transformation.

The ruler will consist in a simple long piece of thin and flexible material

And here the interesting of this works begins:

We don't start using a unit of radius as can be 1, but using a unit of circumference  $2\pi$  that will be the longitude of the flexible ruler.

That is, ruler = longitude of the circumference that we will use to get the circle that later on we proceed to
