

Hybrid-variant recognition is a process of identifying and classifying variants in a sample based on their sequence profile. This process involves several steps, including initial screening of the sample for specific variants, followed by sequencing and analysis of the variants to determine their characteristics and potential clinical significance. The final output of this process is a report that includes a detailed description of the variants found in the sample, along with their estimated frequency and any associated clinical information.

- Initial screening: This step involves identifying the presence of specific variants in the sample. This can be done using a variety of methods, including PCR, sequencing, and bioinformatics analysis. The goal of this step is to quickly identify any variants that may be present in the sample.
- Sequencing: Once specific variants have been identified, the next step is to sequence the variants to determine their characteristics. This can be done using a variety of sequencing methods, including Sanger sequencing, next-generation sequencing, and bioinformatics analysis. The goal of this step is to obtain detailed information about the variants, including their sequence profile, estimated frequency, and any associated clinical information.
- Analysis: The final step in the hybrid-variant recognition process is to analyze the data obtained from the sequencing and bioinformatics analysis. This involves using statistical methods to determine the estimated frequency of each variant and any associated clinical information. The goal of this step is to provide a detailed report that includes a description of the variants found in the sample, along with their estimated frequency and any associated clinical information.

Variant Type	Sequencing Method	Analysis
Known variants	PCR	Statistical analysis
Unknown variants	Next-generation sequencing	bioinformatics analysis
Novel variants	Sanger sequencing	Statistical analysis
