Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was conducted in a community-based setting. The participants were 20 sedentary, middle-aged women who were randomly assigned to either a walking program or a control group. The walking program consisted of 12 weeks of supervised walking, 3 times per week, for 30 minutes per session. The control group did not participate in any exercise program. The physical health outcomes measured were weight, body mass index (BMI), waist circumference, and blood pressure. The psychological health outcomes measured were self-esteem, anxiety, and depression. The results showed that the walking program had a significant positive effect on all the physical and psychological health outcomes. The walking program group had significantly lower weight, BMI, waist circumference, and blood pressure compared to the control group. The walking program group also had significantly higher self-esteem, lower anxiety, and lower depression compared to the control group. The results suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can improve the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.
