Dental caries, also known as tooth decay, is primarily caused by the deposit of plaque on the surfaces of the teeth. Plaque consists of a thin, sticky film of bacterial debris, mucous and salivary. Although rates of protective factors in the saliva help protect the teeth by neutralizing acids and washing away food particles, bacterial activity in the plaque can still harm enamel until that gradually during the progress of the tooth. Once a cavity begins, erosion continues into the dentin and if left untreated, to the pulp and nerves of the tooth.

Inspection: Because early tooth decay often has no pain, regular dental checkups are important to detect cavities before they develop. Once a cavity is identified, the decayed portion of the tooth is removed with a filling and a crown, if necessary. Tooth decay that has reached the pulp will require additional treatment, such as antibiotic prescription and root canal treatment (see also periodontal disease).
