It is generally agreed that the great majority of people who are experiencing difficulties with their personal relationships are not in a position to identify the problem, let alone to resolve it. People are often too embarrassed, frightened, or confused to identify the problem, let alone to resolve it.

be more successful. However, these findings represent only a portion of the data collected, and more detailed analyses will be presented in the future. The results of this study will be used to develop programs to increase the number and quality of new immigrants to the United States.
