We live in a world of rankings. We rank everything from sports teams to flavors of ice cream. However, rankings of educational institutions are some of the most popular and most influential rankings. A school's rank is a status symbol. Graduating from a top ranked school opens doors into the upper echelon of society, whereas affiliation with a lower ranked school can be a mark on your record forever. The public rely on these rankings and make many decisions based upon them. However, do we know what the rankings actually measure? Or, how valid and reliable they are? Or, what are the consequences, intended or unintended, of our reliance upon them?

In Engines of anxiety: Academic rankings, reputation, and accountability, Wendy Nelson Espeland and Michael Sauder (2016) address these questions by analyzing one discrete set of education rankings, the U.S. News and World Report (USN) law school rankings. Supported by various grants and fellowships, Espeland and Sauder, two sociologists at major research
