Overview:

- Mood refers to a sustained emotion that colors the way we view life.
- As many as 20% of adult women and 10% of adult men may have the experience at some time during their lives.
- Mood disorders seem to be increasing in both sexes, accounting for 50%+ mental health visits.
- Mood disorders are more common among those who are single and who have no "significant other" and in someone who has relatives with similar problems.

A quick guide to mood disorders:

- DSM-5 uses three groups of criteria sets to diagnose mental problems related to mood:
  1. Mood episodes
  2. Mood disorders
  3. Specifiers describing the most recent episode, recurrent course, and severity.

Mood Episodes:

- Any period when a patient feels abnormally happy or sad. Mood episodes are the building blocks from which many of the codable mood disorders are constructed.
- Most patients with mood disorders (though not most mood disorder types) will have one or more of these three episodes (major depressive, manic, and hypomanic).
- Without additional information, none of these mood episodes is a codable diagnosis.

Depression can be hard to spot:

- Not all patients can recognize or accurately describe how they feel.
- Clinicians and patients who come from different cultural backgrounds may have difficulty agreeing that the problem is depression.
- The presenting symptoms of depression can vary greatly from one person to another. One person may be slowed down and crying; another will smile and deny that anything is wrong. Some sleep and eat too much; others complain of insomnia and anorexia.
- Some people don't feel depressed; rather, they experience depression as a loss of pleasure or reduced interest in their usual activities, including sex.
- Crucial to diagnose is that the episode must represent a noticeable change from the person's usual level of functioning.
- If your client does not notice it (some people are too ill to pay attention or too apathetic to care), family or friends may report there has been such a change.
