

Survival of the Fittest— Battling Beetles

Introduction

Two important observations Charles Darwin made during his travels were (1) living things occupy a planet that is constantly changing and (2) living things change over time. These two observations led him to the concept of “descent with modification.” Darwin wrote that the presence of variations within species fuels the process of change over time—evolution.

Part One

Phase One—Setting the Scene

Female beetles of the Ovalis glucosi species dig tunnels into the soil. When a female has dug a tunnel that is deep enough, she forms a small cavity at the end away from the entrance. This is where she will lay her eggs and raise her young.

Scientific studies have shown that an O. glucosi female will mate repeatedly. It is also known that the sperm most recently deposited is the sperm that will fertilize her eggs. Since the female beetle is in the tunnel, a male must gain access to the tunnel in order to mate.

Once they have mated, a male O. glucosi beetle attempts to control access to the female by guarding the entrance of her tunnel. The male remains inside the tunnel with the female and fights off any intruding males. A rival male could gain possession of a tunnel (and the female) if he successfully evicts the resident male. During the battle, dueling males crash into each other. The intruder tries to squeeze by the defender. The stronger male gets to stay and the weaker male is either crushed or moves on.

A research team studying mating behavior in the O. glucosi beetle species observed the appearance of a few red beetles in the population, which had previously been 100% blue. The red males appeared to be very successful in gaining access to the tunnels. Why are the red beetles so successful? Do they possess any obvious variations that would give them an advantage over blue beetles?
