Genes in the Field: Conserving Plant Diversity on Farms is a comprehensive collection of papers focusing on agricultural conservation and diversity issues throughout the world. Recently regional and local farm seed variety has been reduced because of increased population, agricultural science and technology and the integration of the world's many diverse cultures. Because of this diversity on individual farms across wide regions is threatened by modern crop varieties that have been bred for broad adaptation, resistance to disease and other risk factors such as their ability to better use water fertilizer and higher yields The concern of the farmers to maintain production levels and income often seems incompatible with those whose focus is on the maintenance of viable and sustainable ecosystems and maintaining genetic diversity Exploring and understanding these different concerns is an essential starting point for answering some of the key questions about the implementation of on farm conservation and the role of local cultivators in sustainable development MARKETING MANAGEMENT J.
