Green Style Melissa J. Begey, 2016 Abstract: This thesis addresses the inherent tensions in discourses of sustainable fashion and explores how several individuals in the fashion industry attempt to reconcile these issues. In addition, it looks at the role of discourse in the socialization of ethical perspectives. The study draws on theoretical and methodological perspectives from linguistic and cultural anthropology, sociology, as well as fashion theory, to analyze how fashion industry professionals discursively negotiate notions of sustainability and the tensions that emerge between ideals and practices. Data collection for this thesis included semi-structured interviews with fashion professionals in Southern California along with participant observation within a university-level fashion textile course. Documenting socialization practices and noting the varying discourses of sustainable fashion in use by industry professionals highlight the challenges designers face in bridging eco-sensibilities with design aesthetics and the complexity of individual agency in being able to participate in the culture of sustainability. The theoretical framework of this thesis demonstrates how linguistic anthropology can contribute to studies of sustainability in fashion design and, in particular, how language use can be analyzed to better understand the ways in which a new generation can be socialized to new or changing ideas and perspectives.

Sustainable Style Lies Ivy Silver, AI, 2025-02-24 Sustainable Style Lies investigates the fashion industry's sustainability claims, questioning whether they represent genuine environmental and social responsibility or mere marketing ploys, a practice known as greenwashing. The book tackles critical areas like the environmental impact of textile production, ethical labor practices, and the influence of marketing on consumer perceptions. The fashion industry significantly contributes to global pollution; for example, textile dyeing is a major source of water contamination. By examining the historical context and current practices, the book argues that systemic challenges require transparent and verifiable changes for sustainable fashion to be authentic. The book progresses in three parts: first, introducing core concepts and scrutinizing industry claims; then, it details the environmental and social costs of textile production from cotton farming to waste management while also assessing garment worker conditions Finally it analyzes the marketing strategies employed by fashion brands offering a framework for evaluating true sustainability and providing recommendations for consumers policymakers and industry stakeholders The book uses scientific studies investigative reports and corporate sustainability reports to reveal the complexities of sustainable fashion and empower consumers to make informed choices
