

The dual focus of this volume is on the plastic nanoparticles (PNPs) that result from the embrittlement and abrasion of the plastic debris illustrated below, as well as the nanoparticles, including nanoplastics, which are the ubiquitous, if invisible, product of the Age of Nanotechnology. Plastic nanoparticles (PNPs) are derived from plastic wastes and become a hazardous material due to declining size and increasing surface to mass ratio, which results in the rapid increase of the sorption (absorption and/or adsorption) of environmental chemicals. Ecotoxic PNPs are then ingested by heterotrophic grazing microbes and are biomagnified in marine and other food webs. Plastic nanoparticles are an additional invisible vector for the movement of environmental chemicals throughout the biosphere, and raise public safety issues of compelling contemporary interest to all concerned citizens.

A riverine environment contaminated with plastic debris after a minor flooding event

The plastics in this photo will gradually abrade and disintegrate into mesoplastics (≤ 10 mm), then into microplastics (< 1 mm) that become increasingly invisible and difficult to quantify as they continue to devolve into plastic nanoparticles (≈ 100 nm).

"Nanoparticles in the environment could constitute a completely new class of non-biodegradable pollutants... [They are] highly reactive nanoparticles which, because of their small size, can have a total surface area measuring up to 1,000 square meters per gram." (Hett 2004)
