Development and Use Periodic Table

Early Periodic Table:

- Periodic table was developed in 1869, Dmitri Mendeleev developed the first periodic table. He arranged elements by increasing atomic mass and negative and positive valence properties periodically repeated. Mendeleev's table left some open spaces that had not been discovered, predicting their properties.
- London Meyer independently, London Meyer published a similar periodic table without the same title as Mendeleev.

Modern Periodic Table:

The periodic table is a powerful tool for understanding the periodic law. It is organized by atomic number, with elements having similar properties in the same groups. Elements within the same group have similar properties due to having the same number of valence electrons. The other three groups have different properties due to having different numbers of valence electrons.

Periodic Law: The periodic law states that the properties of elements are periodic function of their atomic number. This means that when elements are arranged in order of increasing atomic number, elements with similar properties are grouped together.
