

Approaches to Studying Audiences

The aims of this Media Studies Factsheet are:

- To provide an introduction to the main theoretical approaches to audience common across A-Level Media Studies specifications, which can then form the basis of further study.
- To evaluate the original uses of these approaches and to consider how they may be applied to contemporary media.
- To enable you to explore applying these approaches to the products you are studying for your course.

What do we mean by audiences?

Defining audiences

The audience is the general term for all the individual people who consume a media product. Let's think of ourselves, first, as individual members of a media audience. We are diverse in our consumption and many of us consume a mixture of products, varying from the mainstream and truly 'popular' to some more niche, specialized interests. Our tastes and habits are shaped in multiple ways and influenced by our sense of identity, our peers, and our cultural background, gender, age, and many other factors.

This infographic uses market research to show how COVID-19 affected media consumption in a particular age bracket. Age is just one way audiences may be defined, the global pandemic just one potential influence.

Activity 1

Produce a diagram or sketch about yourself and your media consumption. Begin with the platforms you use, then move towards more detail such as the channels, programmes or publications that you consume most regularly.

Now that you've produced your own sketch, think about the following:

What technologies do you use to access the media, and how are they paid for?

- Which of the products are mainstream (watched by lots of different types of people) and which are niche (with more specialized audiences)?
- The reason for consuming the product (in your own words, without applying any theories you already know).
- Which aspects do you think are quite predictable for a person of your age and gender, the simplest of demographic information? Which are more unique to you?

Measuring audiences

Media producers use data which may be simple or complex to target their audience, whether that is through choice of platform, scheduling or algorithm. Many media companies rely on the services of another organization to tell them who consumes their products, and the companies that collect this data may be the host service in the case of a web or digital text, sales analytics, or a specialist company who collect data about who is purchasing print media or watching specific television programmes.

This data may range from the simple (how many people consumed the television programme or clicked on the link) to masses of complex marketing information about the media they consume, where they live in the world, the sector they work in etc. The vast majority of media texts are produced for commercial reasons (even prosumer content, which may begin as a hobby or enthusiasm) so this information forms a whole sub-section of the marketing industry. There is a lot at stake in a media-saturated world in knowing who is consuming the content you produce and what they like about it.
