Bathing Clients

- Ask the client if he or she uses special soap, lotion, or other hygiene products. Determining the client's preferences individualizes care.
- Wear gloves if there is any potential for direct contact with blood, drainage, or other body fluid. Gloves reduce the potential for acquiring an infection.
- Keep the client covered during the bath. Covering the client demonstrates respect for modesty.
- Wash cleaner areas of the body first and dirtier areas last. This reduces the spread of microorganisms.
- Encourage the client to participate at whatever level is appropriate. Participation promotes independence and self-esteem.
- Monitor the client's tolerance of activity. If activity becomes too strenuous, it should be discontinued and resumed later.
- Inspect the body during washing for skin disorders (Table 17-3). Bathing provides an excellent opportunity for physical assessment.
- Communicate with the client and use the occasion to do informal health teaching. Talking demonstrates respect for the client as a person rather than an object being washed; teaching promotes health.
- Wash one part of the body at a time. Exposing only one part prevents chilling.
- Place a towel under the part of the body being washed. A towel absorbs moisture.
- Use firm but gentle strokes. Gentle strokes avoid friction that can damage the skin.
- Wash and dry well between folds of skin. Effective washing removes debris and microorganisms from areas where they are apt to breed.
- Keep the washcloth wet, but not so wet that it drips. This demonstrates concern for the client's comfort.
- Wash more soiled areas, such as the anus, test. Doing so prevents transferring microorganisms to cleaner areas of the body.
- Remove all soap residue. This prevents drying the skin and possible itching.
- Dry the skin after it has been rinsed. Drying the skin prevents chilling.
- Replace the water as it cools. Using warm water shows concern for the client's comfort.
- Apply an emollient lotion to the skin after bathing. A lotion restores lubrication to the skin.
