

Hybrid-variant recognition is a process of identifying and classifying variants in a sample based on their sequence profile. This process involves several steps, including initial screening, sequencing, and analysis of the sequence data to determine the presence of variants. The final output is a report that includes the sequence data, a list of variants, and their characteristics, such as frequency and distribution.

- Initial screening: This step involves identifying the presence of variants in the sample. This can be done using various methods, such as sequencing or bioinformatics analysis. The goal is to quickly identify the presence of variants without necessarily determining their exact sequence.
- Sequencing: Once variants are identified, the next step is to sequence them. This involves extracting the DNA or RNA from the sample and sequencing it to determine the exact sequence of the variants. This can be done using various sequencing methods, such as Sanger sequencing or next-generation sequencing.
- Analysis: The final step is to analyze the sequence data to determine the presence of variants. This involves comparing the sequence data to a reference genome or database to determine the presence of variants. The analysis can also involve determining the frequency and distribution of variants.
