Understanding Formulaic Writing Processes Heather McClelland,2002 This qualitative research design was to discover how formulaic writing processes influence a student's ability to write creatively and effectively. This paper studies the effectiveness of formulaic writing and closely examines two important writing structures the Six Trait model and the Jane Schaffer method which are currently taught in schools throughout Washington State. In addition to exploring the current literature on formulaic writing processes a study was conducted where Language Arts teachers and Language Arts students in the middle school level were interviewed surveyed and responded to writing prompts on the Six Traits and Jane Schaffer writing approaches. Based on the finding I created a website that is an informational guide to help educators who teach formulaic writing processes.
