Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 10-week, 100-hr, nonclinical, predoctoral internship on the self-reported confidence of students in their ability to perform various tasks associated with the practice of counseling. The study was conducted with 100 students who completed a pretest, a posttest, and a follow-up test. The results of the study indicated that the students' self-reported confidence in their ability to perform various tasks associated with the practice of counseling increased significantly after completing the internship. The results also indicated that the students' self-reported confidence in their ability to perform various tasks associated with the practice of counseling remained high at the follow-up test. The results of this study have implications for the development of predoctoral internships and for the assessment of student confidence in their ability to perform various tasks associated with the practice of counseling.
