

Section II: Drainage

An often-repeated adage in the road construction and maintenance business is that “The three most important things to understand in building and maintaining roads are drainage, drainage, and drainage!” This certainly does get an important message across. But, too often, this critical issue is ignored when building and maintaining local roads. When drainage is poor, the best efforts to rehabilitate or maintain roads will bring disappointing results. When water can be drained off of road surfaces and out of roadbed soils, the road will invariably become easier to maintain.

This can hardly be emphasized enough. But this is not a drainage manual and therefore the discussion will only cover basic drainage matters. A good reference is Roadway and Roadside Drainage by the Cornell Local Roads Program at Cornell University. (27) Call the LDAP center in your state to obtain a copy.

Too often the maintenance team deals with surface problems that really come from wet and weak soil conditions below the road. Since gravel roads generally carry low volumes of traffic and do not have large budget allocations for maintenance, a maintenance operator must do what it takes to reestablish and/or keep drainage working on gravel roads. Previous sections of this manual have already discussed the road profile which is the first line of defense for good drainage. The discussion will now continue with three more basic drainage topics: ditches, culverts, and underdrains.
