Genetics: Engineering

The DNA sequence of an organism's genome is a challenge for all geneticists. Some organisms, like bacteria, have genomes that are integrated with the rest of the cell. In contrast, the human genome is a separate entity. The human genome is composed of 23 pairs of chromosomes, each containing thousands of genes. These genes are the units of heredity. They are the instructions for building and maintaining the body. They also control the way the body reacts to its environment. For example, a gene for a certain protein may be turned on or off depending on the environment. This is called gene expression. The human genome is composed of 3.2 billion base pairs of DNA, and the human genome is about 99% identical to every other person's genome. The human genome is also composed of many different types of DNA, including protein-coding DNA, non-coding DNA, and DNA that is not used for anything.

- 1. Which statement is true about the human genome?

- c. It contains all the genetic information needed to build a virus.

2. Which statement is true about the human genome?
