

CHAPTER 10 INTEREST GROUPS

PARALLEL LECTURE 10.1

- I. Interest groups and the American political tradition
 - A. An interest group (lobby) is "an organized body of individuals who share some political goals and try to influence public policy."
 - B. Do interest groups contribute to the proper functioning of democracy, or are they a threat to it?
 1. Alexis de Tocqueville, in Democracy in America, suggested that the ease with which Americans form organizations is a reflection of a strong democratic culture.
 2. In Federalist No. 10, James Madison warned, however, of the dangers of "factions."
 - a) He noted that the causes of factions were "sown in the nature of man."
 - b) He believed it was a mistake to try to eliminate factions, because that would restrict liberty. Rather, relief from factions should come from controlling their effects.
 - C. Interest groups play many roles in the American political system.
 1. Representation: Interest groups represent their constituents before government.
 2. Participation: They facilitate people's participation in politics.
 3. Education: Efforts made by interest groups help to educate their members, the public at large, and government officials.
 4. Agenda building: News issues are brought into the political limelight through interest group advocacy.
 5. Program monitoring: Lobbying organizations keep track of how programs are working in the field and try to persuade government to take action when problems become evident.
- II. How do interest groups form?
 - A. Pluralists such as David Truman see interest groups naturally forming when people are adversely affected by a disturbance (disturbance theory).
 1. Yet some people who are adversely affected do not organize.
 2. Herbert Gans's The Urban Villagers tells the story of Boston's West Enders, who did not effectively organize to stop the bulldozing of their neighborhood.
 - B. Political scientist Robert Salisbury argues that the quality of leadership is a key determinant of successful interest group formation.
 1. He sees an interest group leader as an interest group entrepreneur. The entrepreneur must convince potential members that there are compelling reasons to join the organization.
 2. The development of the United Farm Workers Union seems to support Salisbury's thesis. Many previous efforts to organize the workers had failed, despite the real need for representation that these poor people had. Cesar Chávez's inspired leadership seemed to make the difference and led to the successful formation of the United Farm Workers Union.
 - C. Who is being organized is also an important force affecting group formation. The wealthy and the well-educated are more likely to form and join lobbies.
 - D. Summing it up, three variables explain why groups may or may not become well-organized:
 1. An adverse change or disturbance
 2. The quality of leadership
 3. The socioeconomic level of potential members
- III. What resources are available to interest groups? Members, lobbyists, and money.
 - A. One of the most valuable resources a group can have is a large and politically active membership.
