Bercau Edwards, 2009 At the age of twenty-one Herman Melville signed on the whaleship Acushnet as a common seaman and sailed from Massachusetts to the South Pacific Upon reaching Nuku Hiva in the Marquesas Islands he deserted and spent a month ashore on this reputed cannibal island He departed as crew of another whaleship but was put ashore in the heavily missionized Tahitian islands after participating in a bloodless mutiny Eventually making his way to Hawaii he joined the crew of the American frigate United States and finally reached Boston in October 1844 after four years at sea By the time he sat down to write his first book Melville had been recounting tales of these experiences orally for four years The spoken elements of the overlapping discourses involving sailors cannibals and missionaries are essential to his first six books Mary K. Bercau Edwards investigates the interplay between spoken sources and written narratives She closely examines how Melville altered original stories and she questions his truthfulness about his experiences Bercau Edwards also explores the synergistic blend of the oral and written worlds of seafaring and the South Pacific and provides an analysis of Melville's development as a writer It is a study of the aesthetic ethical linguistic and cultural implications of Melville's borrowing Cannibal Old Me is an excellent contribution to Melville scholarship challenging
