Local Music Streaming Market? François Moreau,Marianne Lumeau,Patrik Wikstrom,Ola Haampland,Rune Johannessen,2023 In cultural industries the fear of large country hegemon has been revived with the growth of subscription services such as Netflix Spotify or Apple Music and the concentration of these markets The aim of this paper is to provide evidence on this issue from music streaming consumption Using a unique dataset that encompasses both streaming and download consumption in France a dynamic local music market representative of the global evolution our results are as follows At the top end we find no difference between streaming and download consumption based on the recording artist s geographical origin Outside the top of the distribution however we observe that the US market share increases in the streaming model to the detriment of local French music This advantage is even stronger for the US back catalogue i e songs released at least ten years ago the market share of a US song from the back catalogue is 26% higher when listened to on a streaming platform compared to when purchased as a download These results are economically significant as non chart and back catalogue songs cumulate a significant market share From a second dataset of all the streams from a sample of French subscribers to a European music streaming platform we show that the implementation of algorithmic recommendations by streaming platforms to guide users contributes to explain the dominance of US back catalogue Altogether these results document that streaming platforms introduce an American bias in music consumption
