My Mourning Routine

When my mother died, I had a "Mourning Routine" which consisted of mourning clothes, death candles in my room, and the place, not clothes, in which I sat and only allowed my mother's face to appear in my mind.

I usually wore continuous mourning, in practice that means the dress on the outside with no pretense for the day, but a special robe with my personal symbols on the inside, and prepared to just sitting and mourning.

The routine also always included a cup of coffee with cream and a glass of wine, which I would drink in my room, frequently meditated and taking care of personal hygiene before placing a structured draft in my bed.

These small mourning steps made a difference in mourning and helped me to live.
