The Second Look The Reconstruction of Personal History in Psychiatry and Psychoanalysis

Samuel Novey, M.D.

In the process of reconstructing history, particularly the clinical history of a patient, the facts can never be accurately or fully reported. In the therapeutic confrontation, however, the patient and therapist can reconstruct a history that creates meaningful relationships between the patient's past life and his present modes of behavior.

An experienced psychoanalyst who was long involved with the training of psychoanalysts, Dr. Novey conducts a searching examination into the authenticity of autobiographical data. Although he believes strongly that historical data derived from patients is of great value in treatment, hypotheses based upon such information are valid only if they constitute a formulation of what people experience in the present.

They are not valid if they are used as evidence for what "actually happened." Using numerous clinical illustrations, he investigates intriguing parallels between the philosophy of history and the questions involved in the use of historical data in the treatment process. He is also led into such varied areas as psychological research into the reliability of anamnestic reports, neurophysiological experiments regarding memory, legal knowledge concerning the validity of evidence, and psychoanalytic theory.

During his last years, the author became increasingly troubled by a growing tendency among some psychotherapists to pay scant attention to the clinical importance of case history. "The therapeutic process," he wrote, "is an interaction in the present conceptually bound to the historical past of the patient. If the patient and his problems are to be understood, history is to be understood; and yet there is little general interest in the broad topic of history throughout the field of personality study."

In an illuminating inquiry into the technical use of history in treatment, he discusses methods by which the reconstruction of history by patient and therapist underscores the living nature of history in the therapeutic process itself. Because Dr. Novey believed that "having a second look" at the past could modify a person's view of his past and thereby modify the course of his future, his book represents an effort to reassert the importance of history in the treatment process and in the patient's understanding of himself.
