These factors have limited previous attempts to evaluate the effectiveness of different interventions. The first is the lack of agreement on what constitutes an improvement. Most studies generally consider the gains, when these might occur from random processes. These studies often bring the attention to the number of new cases, leading to very fluctuating results. This makes it difficult when the intervention continues the creation of new cases to determine its effectiveness. The second issue is power. The studies investigating effectiveness, often use incomplete or incomplete measures of infection, such as the number of new infections over time, which often requires follow-up of individuals. Many of the studies investigating new interventions often prove inconclusive, because they do not have enough power to detect significant improvements.

These findings have important policy implications for reducing the negative impacts of climate change. The findings suggest aggressive action on the climate front is necessary to prevent further ecosystem damage. The results suggest that more aggressive action on climate change is necessary to prevent further ecosystem damage. The results suggest that more aggressive action on climate change is necessary to prevent further ecosystem damage.
