

There Are New Solutions

With a focus group of business leaders, commissioners from 10 FAFAS regions discuss a growing segment of students who come to college with a combination of personal and financial challenges and barriers related to college. These challenges include, among others, low income, financial need, family instability, and those students in this group that come to college in a college community with unique needs that include students of single-parent families, students experiencing family and financial challenges, students in rural or first-generation families, and students whose parents did not graduate. The “new solutions” that FAFAS and partners have developed address the unique challenges associated with these students in order to give them a opportunity to succeed in college.

“The local offices of FAFAS have their deep knowledge of the issues of aid availability and the challenges,”

Why is it so hard to increase aid availability? According to experts in the field, when colleges have partnerships with the institutions in a college’s service area, the college can better serve the community members who are associated with the college. With regard to college aid, the experts say that a strategic financial aid partnership provides a college with a way to maximize the student experience and assist students in achieving the goals of a college or university and the institution’s own mission and values.

“Our local offices in the American and the International Board of Directors of FAFAS are working to implement this,”
