Mapped Mysteries - Setting

Name: _____

Set the stage for a suspense-filled mystery!

Where will your mystery begin? Choose a place. Then make some notes about that place to help you describe it to your audience.

Mapped Mysteries - Developing Characters

Name: _____

As you develop your characters, consider how they will look, what they will do, what they will say, and additional evidence.

- How the Character Looks - This is the least important characteristic to develop. You may, however, use a character's physical characteristics to throw your audience off the track. For example, a rule like "get me actually be the suspect. Since this is a mystery story, you should add small details that lead your audience to the solution (or keep them off track). For example, shiny eyes or shaky hands makes a character seem nervous - or even guilty.
- What the Character Does - You've probably heard that "actions speak louder than words." Consider what your character will do. This can make them seem guilty or innocent.
- What the Character Says - What a character says - and how they say it - makes a mystery come to life. Instead of telling the whole story upfront, let your characters tell part of it. Be sure to give each of them a special way of speaking that gives them personality.
- Additional Evidence - Little things like gross stains on the bottom of a character's pants or windows that provide even more evidence.

Mapped Mysteries - Developing Plot

Name: _____

Most detective stories have plots that are mapped. The events in the story develop clue after clue. Some are real clues, others are false clues, or red herrings. As a mystery writer, you must make a clear path of evidence from the mystery to the solution.

To get started, write a series of real clues that will lead your audience to the solution.

Clue 1	Clue 2	Clue 3	Clue 4

However, the path should not be too clear. Throw in a few red herrings to get your audience one or two additional possibilities for solving the mystery.
