My Mourning Routine

When my mother died, I had a "Mourning Routine" that consisted of mourning clothes, death candles lit on the day, flowers that she picked, and candles in rooms that she did not inhabit. Her funeral was a religious ceremony, but I did not believe in religion, and I did not want to go.

I usually wore mourning clothing, a practice that began the night on the anniversary of her death, and continued for the day. I had a special robe with my favorite pattern on it. I'd spend precious time just sitting and mourning.

The routine also included wearing a bag of coffee beans every day to spread their "coffee" around the house. I'd also frequently inhale the bag, taking care of potential fungus before placing it somewhere safe for the day.

These small mourning rituals made a difference of mourning and mourning in my life.
