

Cow Eye Dissection

A cow eye is very similar to the eye of a human. By dissecting and examining the anatomy of a preserved cow eye, you can learn how your own eye forms images of the world around you and sends those images to your brain. This dissection guide is complete enough for a high school lab.

Observation: External Anatomy

Look carefully at the preserved cow eye. The most noticeable part of the eye is the large mass of gray tissue that surrounds the posterior (back) of the eye and is attached to the sclera. The second most noticeable part of the eye is the cornea, located in the anterior (front) part of the eye. Due to the fact that the eye has been preserved, the cornea is cloudy and translucent in color. It may also be slightly yellow and appear a bit "deflated". On the posterior side of the eye, hidden in the fat and muscle tissue, there is a relatively round protrusion that looks differ from the surrounding tissue. This is the optic nerve, and it sends the images reflected in the eye to the brain.

Dissection: Internal Anatomy

1. Place the cow eye on a dissecting tray. Carefully cut away the excess fat and muscle. As you get closer to the actual eyeball, you may notice muscles that are attached directly to the sclera and along the optic nerve. These are the extraocular muscles that allow it to move its eye up and down and from side to side. Keep cutting along the sclera, separating the muscles. Fat attaches the muscle to it. After removing the excess tissue, the sclera and optic nerve should be exposed but still intact.
2. Using a sharp scalpel, cut through the sclera around the middle of the eye so that one half will have the anterior features of the eye (the cornea, lens, iris, and ciliary body) and the other half will contain the posterior features (most notably where the optic nerve is attached to the eye). The inside of the eye cavity is filled with liquid. This is the vitreous humor. Depending on how the specimen was preserved, it will be either a dark liquid that will flow out easily, or a slightly gelatinous material that you can pour out to remove. (In a living eye, the vitreous humor is clear and gel-like.)

3. Flip the anterior half of the eye over so that the front of it is facing upward. Using a pair of sharp scissors, cut the sclera from the eye along the boundary where the cornea meets the sclera. When the sclera has cut in far enough, a clean fold will start to sweep out. This is the aqueous humor. While cutting out the cornea, be careful to not accidentally cut the iris or the lens. After removing the cornea, push it up and look through it. Although it is cloudy due to the degenerating of the tissue, it is still fairly transparent. Notice the toughness and strength of the cornea. It is designed this way to protect the more delicate features found inside the eye.
4. With the front of the anterior half of the eye facing up, locate the iris. Notice how the iris is positioned so that it surrounds and protects the lens. This position allows the iris to open and close around the lens to allow different amounts of light into the eye. In bright light, the iris contracts to let in less light. In dim light, such as at night, the iris expands to let in more light.A diagram showing the iris in two states. On the left, labeled "bright light", the iris is contracted and small. On the right, labeled "dim light", the iris is expanded and large, covering more of the pupil.
5. Flip the anterior half over and examine the back half. Locate the lens and ciliary body. The ciliary body surrounds the lens, allowing it to change the shape of the lens to help the eye focus on the object it is viewing.A diagram showing the lens and ciliary body in two states. On the left, labeled "bright light", the lens is thin and flat. On the right, labeled "dim light", the lens is thick and rounded.
6. After examining both sides of the anterior half of the eye, pull the lens out. While the lens was alive, the lens was clear and very flexible. In a preserved cow eye, the lens will most likely have hardened and become very hard. However, it may still be possible to pull through the lens and see its ability to magnify objects. Try this by placing the lens on a piece of paper with writing on it.
7. On the posterior half of the eye, there is a thin, tissue-like material that allows easily inside the eye. This is the retina. The retina contains photoreceptor cells that collect the light entering the eye through the lens from the outside world. These images are sent to the optic nerve, the spot where the optic nerve attaches to the eye. At this point, there are no photoreceptor cells; there are only nerves sending images to the backgrounds coming to the subject for the first time Resources for Teaching Middle School Science Smithsonian Institution, National Academy of Engineering, National Science Resources Center of the National Academy of Sciences, Institute of Medicine, 1998-04-30 With age appropriate inquiry centered curriculum materials and sound teaching practices middle school science can capture the interest and energy of adolescent students and expand their understanding of the world around them. Resources for Teaching Middle School Science developed by the National Science Resources Center NSRC is a valuable tool for identifying and selecting effective science curriculum materials that will engage students in grades 6 through 8. The volume describes more than 400 curriculum titles that are aligned with the National Science Education Standards. This completely new guide follows on the success of Resources for Teaching Elementary School Science the first in the NSRC series of annotated guides to hands on inquiry centered curriculum materials and other resources for science teachers. The curriculum materials in the new guide are grouped in five chapters by scientific area Physical Science, Life Science, Environmental Science, Earth and Space Science and Multidisciplinary and Applied Science. They are also grouped by type core materials, supplementary units and science activity books. Each annotation of curriculum material includes a recommended grade level, a description of the activities involved and of what students can be expected to learn, a list of accompanying materials, a reading level and ordering information. The curriculum materials included in this book were selected by panels of teachers and scientists using evaluation criteria developed for the guide. The criteria reflect and incorporate goals and principles of the National Science Education Standards. The annotations designate the specific content standards on which these curriculum pieces focus. In addition to the curriculum chapters, the guide contains six chapters of diverse resources that are directly relevant to middle school science. Among these is a chapter on educational software and multimedia programs, chapters on books about science and teaching, directories and guides to science trade books and periodicals for teachers and students. Another section features institutional resources. One chapter lists about 600 science centers, museums and zoos where teachers can take middle school students for interactive science experiences. Another chapter describes nearly 140 professional associations and U.S. government agencies that offer resources and assistance. Authoritative, extensive and thoroughly indexed and the only guide of its kind, Resources for Teaching Middle School Science will be the most used book on the shelf for science teachers, school administrators, teacher trainers, science curriculum specialists, advocates of hands on science teaching and concerned parents.
