My Mourning Routine

When my mother died, I had a "Mourning Routine" which consisted of mourning clothes, death candles in my room, and the place, not clothes, in which I sat. My only intention for the routine was to give me a sense of control.

I usually wore something "feminine" in practice that made me think of my childhood and of places that I had been. I would have my own personal candle lit. I'd listen to music in my room, sitting and "mourning."

The routine also always included a bag of coffee beans sitting next to my bed. Coffee means life. I'd inhale it, then frequently inhale it, and make sure of personal hygiene before placing a structured cloth on my bed.

These small mourning steps made a difference of mourning and control in my life.
