The approximately 100000 people who gathered in the streets of Washington, D.C., for the anti-apartheid demonstration on Saturday, June 19, 1986, were a mixture of people from all walks of life. The demonstrators included students, workers, housewives, and even a few black politicians. They were joined by the Rev. Jesse Jackson, who was the main speaker at the rally. The rally was held in front of the U.S. Capitol building, and it was one of the largest demonstrations in the history of the city. The demonstrators were protesting against the apartheid government in South Africa, which was then ruled by the white-minority government. They were demanding that the U.S. government take action to end apartheid. The rally was a success, and it helped to bring the issue of apartheid to the attention of the American people.
