EXPERIMENTS AND MAKING SENSE OF SCIENCE

Collecting Evidence

When you record what happens in an experiment, you collect evidence. This evidence is used to test your hypothesis.

For example: If you test how quickly ice melts in different rooms, you collect evidence that the room that the ice melts fastest in is the warmest. That's your evidence.

Good scientists always think about evidence carefully. They ask:

- Did the ice melt faster in the room that was warmer?
- Did the ice melt faster in the room that was warmer?
- Did the ice melt faster in the room that was warmer?

Checking your results helps you give a better explanation.

Drawing Conclusions

When you have your evidence, you can draw what it tells you. This is called a conclusion. For example:

- What did the results show?
- Did the ice melt faster in the room that was warmer?
- Did the ice melt faster in the room that was warmer?
- What would be a better hypothesis?

A good conclusion is based on facts - not guesses.

The Role of Hypothesis

Sometimes, an experiment needs to be repeated to check the results. This is because you need to be sure that your hypothesis is correct. If your results are not what you expected, you can change your hypothesis and try again.

Final Thoughts

Being a scientist is not just about the experiments. It's also about the way you think. You need to be able to think about things in a logical way. You need to be able to think about things in a logical way. You need to be able to think about things in a logical way.
