Week 6: Education

According to functionalists, what is the 'assimilationist' function of education?

Schools are the official agency for passing on society's prevailing values since learning a common language and the facts of common history . . . create a sense of a affinity among members of a society.

According to conflict theorists, what is 'credentialism' and how do credentials limit upward social mobility?

Credentialism refers to the common practice of relying on earned credentials when hiring staff or assigning social status instead of directly evaluating on individuals abilities.

- Conflict theorists see " education as central to a status competition among groups within society."

While credentials are normally valued as vice of career readiness (e.g. knowledge and skills), conflict theorist view them as limiting social mobility

- High-status groups maintained their social position by acquiring more education and more educational credentials
- Credentials limit access to high-status positions

According to conflict theorists, what does 'social reproduction' refer to?

Refers to the ways in which schools help perpetuate social and economic inequalities across the generation

- Conflict theorist argue "that the hidden curriculum is the mechanism through which social reproduction occurs

How does educational 'tracking' reproduce class inequality?

Tracking divides students into groups based on ability — leading to differences in instruction

- Research indicates that while tracking does have positive benefits for advanced students
