The Viral Video Phenomenon.

What Makes Videos Go Viral? Katja Grasberger, 2016 Seminar paper from the year 2014 in the subject Communications Multimedia Internet New Technologies grade 2.0 University of Bonn Anglistik course Digital Cultures language English abstract It will probably shock you that the original version of Gangnam Style by the Korean singer PSY standing for psycho is the most watched video on YouTube of all time counting over 800 million views since it has been uploaded in 2010 What it features is a song that will stick to your head and dance moves everyone will try to imitate it had what it took to go viral to spread around the world like a sickness This phenomena is not bound to one specific video genre in this case a music video but can be found in other genres as well for example in comics animal or amateur videos Everyone can become famous on the internet by the day after tomorrow if his or her video got what it takes to become viral But what does it take A lot of viral videos do not feature informative content that helps us in any way or is important for our lives nor does the content make any sense at all sometimes It even appears that the videos with no content are even more popular Although there are many viral videos of very different genres they all share to some degree certain qualities however can their success in the digital Internet age not be boiled down to a simple set of rules neither can it be predicted because these qualities are only features that can help as it has also a lot to do with luck and timing By looking at the videos Charlie bit my finger again The Sneezing Baby Panda and Dramatic Chipmunk David After Dentist we will see that although they are very different and feature different content they have qualities that are similar and that some have qualities that the others will not have demonstrating that there are no general or universal rules one can use and then have viral success

Localizing Content in Videos Via Textual and Visual Queries Yang Feng (Computer scientist),2020 The applications of videos in our lives have been increasing dramatically in the past few years On one hand surveillance cameras that can continuously record videos are widely deployed all over the world On the other hand it is becoming more popular than ever for the average users to share and watch videos on social media anywhere at any time With more and more videos generated every day exploring so many videos becomes increasingly challenging Although it is possible to store the surveillance videos over a long period the information stored in surveillance videos cannot be fully exploited without automation For example surveillance videos are usually viewed manually It is extremely inefficient for a human viewer to search for something or somebody over a long time range in surveillance videos Similar issues arise when a user wants to find specific video content of interest in a very long video To explore the huge amount of videos it is therefore necessary to build computerized tools that help users find the video content they want in an efficient manner This thesis develops methods for efficiently localizing specifically given content in videos For surveillance videos we are particularly interested in finding the appearance of a certain person which is needed in many security applications For user generated videos or entertainment videos we design localizing methods with different types of queries which can be either video samples or natural sentences It is straightforward to use a natural sentence as a query to indicate what a user wants to find However some video content is difficult to describe clearly using a few sentences When a video sample is available the video sample can be used as the query which accurately conveys the intended semantics To facilitate large scale content based video search we also investigate universal embedding which shows good performance on multiple domains by a single model Pages xv xvi Searching for Videos Ynze Abe Houten,2009

Lecture Video Search Engine Using Hadoop MapReduce Piyush P. Deollikar,2017 Abstract With the advent of the Internet and ease of uploading video content over video libraries and social networking sites the video data availability was increased very rapidly during this decade Universities are uploading video tutorials in the online courses Companies like Udemy coursera Lynda etc made video tutorials available over the Internet We propose and implement a scalable solution which helps to find relevant videos with respect to a query provided by the user Our solution maintains an updated list of the available videos on the web and assigns a rank according to their relevance The proposed solution consists of three main components that can mutually interact The first component called the crawler continuously visits and locally stores the relevant information of all the webpages with videos available on the Internet The crawler has several threads concurrently parsing webpages The second component obtains the inverted index of the web pages stored by the crawler Given a query the inverted index is used to obtain the videos that contain the words in the query The third component computes the rank of the video This rank is then used to display the results in the order of relevance We implement a scalable solution in the Apache Hadoop Framework Hadoop is a distributed operating system that provides a distributed file system able to handle large files as well as distributed computation among the participants
