

The world in which young people live today is noticeably different from the one in which their parents grew up (Hiebert, 2002). Hiebert suggests that we, as a society, are only beginning to identify and understand the nature of this change. Listening to the needs and wants of young people enables society to provide appropriate 'tools' that are necessary for them to survive and succeed. Today schools are shifting from their sole objective of transfer and absorption of knowledge and academic achievement to also include a more inclusive focus on the development of the whole individual (Ainley, 1995; Jarvenoja & Jarvela, 2005; Patrikakou, 2004). Fullarton (2002) describes this as being a shift from a focus on what is learned to a focus on what it takes to develop the learner. Silins and Murray-Harvey (1998) also recognise the growing responsibility of schools to provide and encourage an array of experiences that enable the psychological, emotional, social and physical development of individuals.

The report, Listening to Student Voices (Education Evolution, 2005) highlights the "traditional" education system's expectation of "students [having the] responsibility to adapt" (p. 2) to the system, a "one size fits all" approach to education. The report goes on to acknowledge how the "traditional environments could have adapted to better serve these potential top achievers" (p. 2), by providing a system that exhibits flexibility and adaptability to individual needs. The changing face of schooling, from a system of teacher-centred teaching to a practice of student-centred learning has shown that the age-old adage of "adults know best", simply no longer applies nor is it effective (Barry & King, 1998; Education Evolution, 2005). This change has also forced those adults in decision-making positions to concede that the 'blind-eye' approach to listening and incorporating the views of students is no longer acceptable (MacBeath, 2001a).
